

What Do You Know About Copyrights - by Lar

Copyright laws are very important to understand whether you are a writer, a professional or a student. Anyone found violating copyright laws or infringing on another's work is subject to penalty. When a person writes a piece, the ownership belongs to the writer regardless of whether the work is a novel, article, or a technical description. Anyone copying or utilizing the work without the permission of the owner is subject under law for prosecution. Thus, copyright laws don't mean that you must get a stamped copy of the work for it to be protected under law.

In other words, once you write an article, the work is yours and no one can use this piece without your consent. The article is signed and sealed. Many authors of books will send their work to the Library of Congress, which takes about eight months to receive copyrights and the charge is around $30; however, even if you do not have the chance to do this, the piece of work still belongs to you legally-and cannot be used without your permission.

Still, regardless of whether or not that piece of writing is sent to the Library of Congress, it is still rightfully owned by the author and no one has the legal right to use this work without the author's permission; otherwise, it is an infringement on the author's rights. Thus the best advice is do not copy anyone's work, since you are subject to penalty for doing so. If you are writing an article or book, you can ask permission from an author if you wish to add a statement, remark, comment or other part from the author's piece into your own work. If you are a student, learn APA and MLA rules extensively to avoid dismissal from school and legal recourse. For more advice on Copyright Laws try accessing the Library of Congress online.

Larry Westfall is the owner of <http://legal-advice-101.com>
Article Submission done by: <http://www.articles-submit.com>
Courtesy of: Penny Stocks 101

Article Source: <http://www.articlecube.com>